He or early seventeenth century, and a varied ollection of German, French, Spanish and scandinavian swords and rapiers. Then there are a shirt of mail, a casque of the sixteenth century, an Arabian belt, bullet box and powder horn of the eighteenth century, as well as a bow, quiver and quiver holder of Japanese eighteenth century workmanship.

The most important of the recent acquisitions is the painting by Robert Henri called "The Spanish Gypsy." It was purchased from the Hearn fund. It will be added to the collection founded by Mr. Hearn after it has been shown in the room of recent accessions. The subject is a member of the gypsy band which encamps at Ventas, a village on the outskirts of Madrid, whence they forage the surrounding country. It is said that when the artist asked this gypsy to pose for him she assumed the pose shown in the portrait. When she saw the finished portrait she is said to have exclaimed the gypsy equivalent to "What a beautiful

In preparing an autobiographical sketch for the Metropolitan Museum Robert Henri adds to the list of places in which he studied with masters "for years inde-pendently in France, Spain and Italy." It was evidently during this period of independent study in Spain that the picture of the gypsy was painted.

The selection of this picture to add to the museum's collection is in line with the course of other museums in selecting Mr. Henri's work. At the Art Association of New Orleans he is represented by "The Spanish Gypsy Girl," at the Carolina Art Association, Charleston, by his "Girl of Toledo, Spain," and in the Columbus Galsellow Snawl. The Bulletin of the museum says of the work: "The picture now owned by the museum is of a type that Mr. Henri delights in painting. The skin is of tawny color, eyes black, hair long and coal black and the mouth and chin strong; it is an excellent example of his
